

Data#3 wins learning and development award for second year in a row

April 18, 2019; Brisbane, Australia: Leading Australian technology services and solutions provider, Data#3, today announced that it has won a LearningElite award for the second year in a row.

Chief Learning Officer magazine's LearningElite program honours the best organisations for learning and development. The robust, peer-reviewed ranking and benchmarking program recognises those organisations that employ exemplary workforce development strategies that deliver significant business results.

Data#3's commitment to learning and development is driven by its aim to foster an inclusive, accessible learning culture, which supports the professional growth and development of its remarkable people. The company exceeded the global benchmark in all categories; learning strategy, learning execution, leadership commitment, learning impact and business performance results.

Data#3 Group Manager of Organisational Development and Human Resources, Tash Macknish, commented, "To win this award for the second year in a row is a fantastic achievement and a testament to our learning and development program at Data#3. Our aim is to provide a broad and diverse learning curriculum, to create a variety of learning avenues and to foster a culture, which creates opportunities for timely and effective continual learning. It's the achievement of these objectives that helps to ensure we attract and retain Australia's top talent. Well done to the team for delivering outstanding outcomes."

Developed under the guidance of a group of chief learning officers and senior learning and development practitioners, the LearningElite program utilises best practices in evaluation to rank organisations based upon their impact, size and industries served. A comprehensive evaluation of learning and development, the LearningElite also recognises individual companies for their efforts in functional areas, including leadership development, use of technology, executive buy-in, and content development and delivery, among others.
